The music of this period reflects the African American writers, philosophers, artists, dancers and musicians express pride in the race. While New York's Harlem is the center of activity, African American cultural expression emerges in urban centers all over the country, with Chicago, Kansas City and Los Angeles reflecting special vitality.

The period begins with the production of the outstanding musicians of this collection, Gospel Pearls, and the formal establishment of the concept of "Race Records," code language for the music (blues, jazz and gospel) marketed to African Americans.

The span of time encompasses spectacular achievements in the various genres of African American music, much of which is captured on the vinyl of the developing recording industry. It is also transmitted across the country through live broadcasts of the developing world of radio. And the music is incorporated into numerous films of the time. The evolution of jazz during this time period is particularly fascinating, as it develops from New Orleans Traditional into Chicago Hot Jazz into Swing and finally into Bop. Numerous racial barriers are challenged—particularly by jazz musicians and by performers of music in the European classical tradition.

The period concludes with the year that historians have designated as the formal end of Swing.

1921 - 1945 THE MUSIC OF THE RENAISSANCE

The music of this period reflects the tremendous creativity generated within the Black Renaissance, a time when the great African American writers, philosophers, visual artists, dancers and musicians seek to celebrate their artistic freedom and express pride in the race. The kick-off year also includes the publication of the major gospel music collection, Gospel Pearls, and the formal establishment of the concept of "Race Records," code language for the music (blues, jazz and gospel) marketed to African Americans.
